The old prospect research paradigm: Gather and collect data.

The new prospect research paradigm: Insight must be fashioned by information.

Writer and anthropologist Mary Catherine Bateson explains insight in this way:

"Insight, I believe, refers to the depth of understanding that comes by setting experiences, yours and mine, familiar and exotic, new and old, side by side, learning by letting them speak to one another."

Fostering new insights in the work of fundraising is the goal of this complimentary copy of The Bibliography: A Guide to Development Research Resources 2007-2008. It sets our experiences with prospect development alongside yours—on the frontline and in supporting services—to learn from each other. Some resources are old, others, new. Many are familiar. A few—with their technical applications—are more exotic.

Our experiences do "sit side by side" and speak to one another in our work together, in conversations we share, and in today's record-setting fundraising results. One of the things we understand is your need for agile access to these resources which will help shape your strategic insight. This CD format of the Bibliography will allow you to search electronically rather than thumbing through its pages.

Colleagues across the country and around the world have shared valuable resources and opinions for this issue, as they have for twenty-five years. The advancement services team helped to shape content under the leadership of Bobbie Strand and with the support of Sarah Billington.

The Chairman of the Board of The New York Times, Arthur Hayes Sulzberger said:

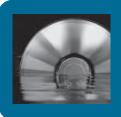

"A man's judgment cannot be better than the information on which he has based it."

Our best wishes for sound judgments and great success!

Strategic Thinkers and Technicians

This is a landmark year in the history of prospect research and development. The Association of Professional Researchers for Advancement marks its twentieth year and The Bibliography: A Guide to Development Research Resources 2007–2008 is in its twenty-fifth year. It is a time of growth and change; and much of that change is in more powerful and comprehensive technical support than ever. Interestingly, this technical capability demands a higher level of strategic thinking and creative planning.

The dichotomy between technology and strategic creativity is finding new expression in the emerging discipline of Fundraising Informatics which blends talent and technology to address fundraising's singular conglomeration of prospect intelligence, funding agendas, leadership styles, "star fundraisers," and technical support.

Prospect developers are bridging the gaps between relevant prospect information and infogarbage to deliver "action-related" data to their fundraising partners.

Business practices in support services are being re-shaped to embody problem solving, innovation, communication, and teamwork. Prospect specialists understand, in metrical terms, their institution's corporate giving potential—not for one prospect, or a small group—but for the entire constituency. How many? How much? How often? When? Where? How?—Numbers of everything, types of constituents, donor levels, percentages of participation, etc.

Analytics has changed thinking patterns and the approach to prospect pipeline development. We now have the ability and the tools to "cut" the numbers on demand in whatever designs are required—by giving amounts, by recent and frequent contributions, by lifetime giving potential, by specific campaign expectations, and by other factors.

Core issues remain constant,; and the key question is: "How can the institution's cast of supporters best equip front-line fundraisers to sit face-to-face with potential donors and successfully make the case for support?"

The next several pages will help acquaint you with some of the exercises in Fundraising Informatics that are supported by the resources included in the bibliography.

A Case Study: Marquette University Advances Prospecting Program with DonorCast Analytics

Data Mining to Find Prospects

Marquette University is a Catholic, Jesuit institution located in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The University enjoys a stronger reputation and more national visibility now than at any other time in its 125year history. There appear to be several reasons for this. There has been steady growth in programs and enrollment. The men's basketball team appeared in the NCAA Final Four in 2003 and the University moved into the Big East Athletic Conference in 2005. The most recent campaign, Magis: The Campaign for Marquette, was a roaring success raising $357 million in gifts, pledges, and other commitments from more than 57,000 donors to help advance the mission of the university. Since the campaign closed in 2005, the staff has invested a great deal of time and energy in prospecting to extend its institutional momentum into the future.

Nonprofit organizations realize that reaching the best prospects is central to their success. Analytics is a set of tools that leverages a strategic combination of new technology and action-oriented approaches to prospect research, tracking, and management to help meet increasing fundraising goals. This broad set of mathematical tools reveals trends and patterns and harvests additional value from existing data that contributes to business intelligence.

Marquette University's Elizabeth Dollhopf-Brown, Director of Prospect Analysis and Research, and Todd McMahon, Associate Director, believed that the integration of analytics would take their fundraising program to a new level of performance. Marquette, in partnership with DonorCast, employed data-driven strategies to ground their decisions in fact and implement an action plan to realize optimal business operations.

Increasing Prospecting Power with Predictive Modeling

Marquette University used a highly interactive process involving the mining of existing data, additional asset screening, and statistical analysis, to help staff

- 1. Identify additional prospects.
- 2. Assess the giving potential of various prospect segments.
- 3. Develop a predictive model(s) to drive major donor qualification.

Predictive modeling is an effective first-wave filtering technique in prospecting. For this reason, Marquette created models predicting major giving to the Law School, to the College of Engineering, and to Endowment.

Analysis Involved Three Major Steps

- 1. Marquette's prospect research professionals worked with DonorCast, to organize a data query for a comprehensive view of the constituency. Data types employed in the query included the following.
 - Demographic
 - Behavioral
 - Attitudinal
 - Transactional
 - Geographic
 - Individual interests
 - Academic data
- 2. The team developed three major giving models for Marquette University. By comparing a dependent variable representing major giving to independent variables using regression analysis, they created a score and rating indicating the future likelihood of major giving potential. For each program area, three models were used as a basis in the development of the final model.
 - Predicted giving to the specified program area at the $10K+ level.
 - Predicted giving to the specified program area at any level.
 - Predicted giving to Marquette at the $25K+ level.
- 3. The results of these three models were merged into an alpha-rating showing a statistical ranking (top one percent, top five percent, etc.) and a three-digit numeric score similar to a credit score showing relative probability. All individual records were scored and rated.

Analytics Toolbox: Predictive Modeling

An outcome of predictive analytics, predictive models are formulas forecasting probability scores for future behaviors. Typically, these formulas are composed using statistical tools such as regression analysis, decision trees, and neural networks.

In fundraising, predictive modeling can meet several needs, including identifying new major and planned giving prospects, segmenting donors likely to respond to your annual solicitations, and predicting potential volunteers.

Turning Propensity Lists into Prospect Lists

Turning Propensity Lists into Prospect Lists Required a Series of Five Steps

- 1. First, the results of the propensity analysis were used to select records to screen with an external vendor. As suggested by the predictive models, Marquette screened 16,000 of the best prospects.
- 2. After the screening results were returned, Marquette applied another set of filters to drill down to a focused list of top prospects within the 16,000. These additional filters began with highest propensity prospects.
- 3. Marquette added the total of identified assets to the propensity spreadsheet for a capacity/propensity mix. Research analysts verified wealth screening results to assign a gift capacity rating to each prospect.
- 4. The prospect research team focused on assigning capacity ratings for prospects with the highest levels of propensity and capacity.
- 5. Area of interest was added by developing capacity ratings for prospects associated with specific law or engineering firms; geographic impact was reflected through regions of the country to add another layer to the identification of the best prospects. As a result, for the Law School, Marquette identified over 325 new prospects and updated the capacity ratings of many others.

Using predictive modeling as a starting point, Marquette has been able to provide prospects who have the strongest possible giving capacity and propensity ratings to their fundraisers.

Extending the Reach of Analytics

Marquette's integration of analytics continues to evolve and grow. While the major gift models are in the implementation stages, data mining has been used as a strategy to determine database capacity and strengthen the annual giving program

Database Capacity and Projection Analysis

A key question Marquette wanted to answer was "What is the capacity of our prospects to give to the Law School and to the College of Engineering?" Using analytical techniques, DonorCast determined the capacity of Marquette's database on a number of levels. For the Law School and the College of Engineering, the predictions of capacity and yields were created for various scenarios. With better understanding of the potential of various constituencies, Marquette is able to make important campaign decisions.

Annual Giving Analysis

Marquette created an Annual Fund propensity score for all individuals in the database. Results are reviewed monthly to track fundraising progress, participation rate by score, and to evaluate the accuracy of the model. During the next year, Marquette plans to refine its annual giving program by:

- 1. Reducing the number of solicitations to non-donors with low scores.
- 2. Providing special attention to non-donors with high scores.
- 3. Determining the right method for soliciting each constituent.
- 4. Creating another model to predict donors among those with low scores.

In the last decade Marquette has made great advances in its development program. A dramatic increase in philanthropic support has brought Marquette close to the leading Catholic institutions. Now, with the incorporation of analytics as a driver of the fundraising program, Marquette's fundraising success is sure to grow to even greater heights.

Prospect Profile—Information to Foster Insight

Prospect researchers are charged with discovering and collating the pertinent facts that can be knit together into information to support viable solicitation strategies. Front-line fundraisers are likewise charged with providing insight based on that information and blended with face-to-face prospect experience.

The following sample prospect profile is crafted to provide a specific audience with specific evidence to help form the insights upon which judgments concerning strategic action will be based. In this sample we present our conclusions and recommendations in the form of an Executive Summary.

The data come from an assortment of free and fee-based sources offering the demographic, biographical, and financial information needed to form a clear perception of the prospect's potential. All of these sources are included in the Bibliography references. Feel free to use the format in your work.

Footnotes identify sources from the Bibliography as they are used.

Common issues we face in

Information Support Systems

Insights are information driven, and information is only as useful as it is accessible.

Three Critical Considerations in Selecting the Best System for Your Circumstances

- 1. Selecting the best option available to meet your specific needs.
- 2. Choosing appropriate upgrades and add-ons as available.
- 3. Re-engineering processes associated with the system on a regular and timely basis.

The Best Choice

Selecting a database and/or constituent relationship management system will shape data management. There is a wide choice of potential systems (pp. 103 to 110). The selection process must consider the organization's unique needs.

Issues Included the Following

- Custom programming costs had become a challenge.
- Newly adopted fundraising best practices were not supported by existing database.
- The team was dedicated to implementing online tools to improve their fundraising success.

At the same time, the organization needed to recognize the culture of "database customization" that had developed over the last fifteen years. Therefore, the selection was eTapestry (p. 106) to meet its database and online needs.

Client:

A growing nonprofit based in the Midwest

Need:

Transition from custom-built MS Access system to off-the-shelf product

System: eTapestry

While there are other viable vendor options that offer database and online interaction tools, the organization valued the flexibility and customization options. eTapestry allowed them to implement an off-the-shelf database with online capabilities and retain the ability to customize certain aspects to mimic their previous environment.

Current System Upgrades

Software vendors regularly update applications to keep pace with innovations. Stay abreast of available upgrades to your applications. In some cases, the system improvements are minor but routine maintenance is essential. Once upgrades have been tested and proven reliable, consider moving to the newest version of your application.

Client:

Healthcare System

Need:

Upgrades

System:

Donor2

After more than five years, a health care system recently chose to take advantage of Donor2's database (p. 104) improvements. They had not upgraded to a new browser-based version of the system when it became available earlier, however. Now, using the older version, many staff found the product's interface unsatisfactory.

The failure to upgrade during more than five years using Donor2 caused front-line staff to be less interested in using the system and training options diminished. As a result, some staff created shadow databases and spreadsheets; others avoided using the database altogether. Earlier this year, they moved to the most current, browser-based version of Donor2.

Technically, this new version did not operate much differently. The table structure of the database changed little. The key change was in accessing and analyzing data. The newer version is more user-friendly, increasing usage. All fundraising units have adopted a new prospect management policy that hinges on consistent usage of database fields. In this case, keeping current resulted in important improvements in the use of the database.

System Re-Engineering

After selecting the most recent version of the right tool, the team must regularly re-evaluate its business practices. Management of system usage, such as prospect tracking and management, has an inherent paradox. On the one hand, the value of a system is the structure and consistency it provides. On the other hand, that same system is obsolete if it does not meet changing expectations. Among the most common triggers for re-engineering are the following:

- New leadership
- A looming campaign
- A new upgrade or purchase of a system module

In addition to keeping current, re-engineering helps align your organization's use of the system with its larger goals.

A university using Sungard BSR's Advance (p. 103) re-evaluated its entire advancement services environment. This holistic analysis assessed organizational structure, staff roles and responsibilities, data processes and systems. A core finding was the system's lack of integration with its other applications, especially its constituent database. Advance was not bridged to its phonathon software. Online giving and other web pages required significant custom programming.

Client: University

Need: Integration

System:

Sungard BSR Advance

This university's comprehensive approach to systems needs aligned staff members to their internal clients' needs. New staff members were added. They moved phonathon applications to the system offered by Sungard BSR, resulting in better integration, data quality and database management processes. Now, the prospect research team, data maintenance staff and gift processing crew see and learn from phonathon results.

Selecting the right application, staying current with improvements and updating business practices using these tools, will increase the value of your data.

The Hand-Off from Back Room to the Front Line

Information has a "shelf" life. The hard work of many researchers is lost because of poor timing.

Issues:

- Incomplete strategic planning between prospecting and fundraising.
- 2. Inadequate metrical understanding of corporate giving potential.
- 3. Lack of coordination between research and front-line action.

On the other hand, information alone has never raised a dime! Who has the baton?

All of the new dimensions and structures for prospecting, research, management and tracking will only fulfill their promise to increase the effectiveness of fundraising programs and individual fundraisers as they are employed corporately and cooperatively.

One of the trickiest parts of the fundraising process is the handoff of information from internal support teams to fundraisers. In order to make the handoff as smooth and flawless as we expect from any relay team, the relationship must be strong—with mutual respect and understanding for the roles every member of the team plays.

Staff members who find the critical information on which judgments about prospect potential are based are partners with the front-line fundraisers who develop insight into the best strategies and timing with prospective donors as a result.

The value added to fundraising by cooperation and coordination in this process is immeasurable, both internally and externally.

The only value of prospect research in fundraising evolves as research enables the institution to seek financial support from the prospects that have been identified, processed and ultimately assigned for contact. Without this external action in an orderly and strategic fashion, research will never raise a dime.

Building a strong bridge between the internal work of prospect development in research, support systems, and constituent relations connecting to the external work of prospect development and face-to-face fundraising is the key.

Researchers and fundraisers can help build the bridge in many ways, including the following.

- All can work at developing strong communication between fundraisers, prospect research and support services.
- Each must work in an effective and credible manner, respecting the expertise, as well as the pressures and concerns, of the other.
- Both should facilitate the integration of the results into each other's work and instruct their counterparts in the processes used.
- The importance of research and the demands of the "front line" must be appreciated by colleagues on both sides of the assignment.
- Well functioning support systems and data accessibility will lighten the loads of all.
- Internal and external development officers need regular, frank and honest discussions to arrive at mutually determined expectations and goals.

The role of the inside fundraising staff is to prepare and support external fundraisers. Staff members on both sides of the team depend on each other and should make the exchange of information—whoever knows it best—a matter of course.

- What do you know right now about the prospect (and how do you know)?
- What is the prospect's current relationship with the institution and what is possible?
- Is there specific information you know that I have not yet discovered?
- Are the names of prospects (and spouses or other) spelled correctly?
- What is the right timing for the actions we should undertake next and what kind of informational support will be required?

There will be multiple "hand-offs" of activity between support roles and front-line officers. If fundraisers and researchers are running the prospect development race in sync, each will instinctively know when they've finished that particular lap. Think through the process together, however, so that you can chart the course and plan ahead for resounding victory!

WELCOME

It is our sincere hope that you and your staff members will find your work lightened by these resources presented on a CD to facilitate your information retrieval. As you peruse the contents, please feel free to make notations of any of your own personal favorites that would add to the value of the next edition and assist the important work of your colleagues. You may fee free at any time to email your suggestions to us: research@bwf.com.

NEW PRESENTATION

It is our pleasure to present The Bibliography: A Guide to Development Research Resources 2007–2008 in a searchable CD format. The layout of the resources remains very much in the reorganized format it was presented last year. As you know, many research categories overlap and do not lend themselves well to hard and fast divisions. There is a degree of cross-referencing between sections that we hope will assist you as you map your way through the document. The basic divisions remain the same as last year's re-formatted version.

- Biographical—Also includes individual wealth references, etc.
- Businesses, Executives—Public and private companies, nonprofits.
- Foundations, Government, and Secretaries of State—Foundations, trusts, and charitable funds. Also includes state and federal grant information, and secretaries of state.
- International—Information from all other countries.
- Reference—Collections, libraries, dictionaries.
- Screening, Software—Screening and software products.
- E-Tools, E-Forums—Listservs, blogs, and search engines.
- Regulations—Compliance standards and regulations for gift accounting, reporting.
- Professional—Resources to aid the work of development professionals.

INDEX

There are two types of indexed material. All bibliography entries are indexed by title for your ease in locating a specific resource. Also, "key words" will help you locate the references relating to a particular subject for which you are seeking information. For instance, "board" or "executives" will identify leaders internally to institutions and for businesses and foundations.

BALANCE

We encourage you to balance your physical and virtual libraries. Some classic, printed resources will grace your shelves and provide constant inspiration and perspective. Internet resources, whether fee-for-service subscriptions or free-of-charge bookmarks, will provide current, up-to-the-minute information. Make selections after outlining your needs and planning your work for the next year.
