

Inaugural Lecture

Humanism, creativity and rights: invoking Henri Lefebvre's right to the city in the tension presented by informal settlements in South Africa today<sup>1</sup>

Marie Huchzermeyer

marie.huchzermeyer@wits.ac.za

Abstract

In urban South Africa today, there is evidence of deep-rooted exclusions, signalling the ongoing need to realise city rights. While the socio-economic rights framework is a liberal one, the 'right to the city' as coined by the French sociologist/philosopher Henri Lefebvre in the late 1960s stems from a Marxist humanism. The literature that considers the relevance of Lefebvre's 'right to the city' for the urban condition of the 21st century largely emanates from and speaks to urban struggles in the First World or so-called 'global North'. At the same time, a prominent shack dwellers' movement in South Africa invokes an explicitly Lefebvrian right to the city in its urban struggles over the past eight years. This paper discusses key aspects of Lefebvre's 'right to the city', in part contested, in relation to the field of tension that represents informal settlements in cities such as Johannesburg today. It focusses in particular on Lefebvre's humanist concept of a right to the 'oeuvre' or 'creative work' in relation to that of 'inhabiting'. These are less explored dimensions of Lefebvre's right to the city, but of central relevance for an engagement with informal settlements and for constructive mobilization around the South African urban condition today.

The need for a new city to emerge out of our present dysfunctional and unjust urban condition is just as urgent now as it was in Lefebvre's time. (Iveson 2013:955)

Introduction

Informal settlements and other forms of unauthorised low income dwellings in South African cities, and the struggles that are fought in their defense, are evidence of deep-rooted exclusions that signal urgent attention to the realisation of city rights. In this paper, I expand on the context of informal settlements in South African cities today, before introducing demands for city rights as a bridge to Henri Lefebvre's work on the right to the city. I will discuss Lefebvre's approach, and then hone in on humanism, creativity and 'to inhabit', before turning to his arguments on urban form and habitat. I then discuss the notion of rights and finally explore concrete proposals emanating from Lefebvre's right to the city as implemented in France and Brazil, which may inform how we treat informal settlements today.

The context of informal settlements in South Africa today

Johannesburg, alongside neighbouring Ekurhuleni, is ranked the world's most unequal city (UN-Habitat 2010). Persistently high levels of planned segregation underpin this inequality, with increasingly the gating and fortification of commercially produced residential developments, contrasted by low density housing estates funded by the state. Physical exclusions and the costs of mobility, in addition to barriers in what has been termed a two-tier economy (World Bank 2013) constrain local economies, livelihoods and socialization. With no formal viable alternative, economically poor households defy and remake the planned city from below through 'informal' means. They have found a foothold in unused and seemingly discarded places, setting up shack settlements as well as trading stalls, at times regularised or authorised post facto if only through court orders, but still subject to repressive measures as witnessed in recent unlawful anti-land invasion measures in Durban (Bar of South Africa 2013) and inner city street trader expulsions in Johannesburg (Tolsi and Nxumalo 2013, Moseneke 2014).

The dominant official policy or political discourse addressing the reality of South African cities today is that of developmentalism – a reliance on economic growth for the resources needed to redress past inequalities or to subsidise and satisfy basic needs (Edigheji 2010). Metropolitan governments, as a consequence, are under pressure to contribute to the national economy by creating the conditions to attract foreign direct investment, competing for prominence as global or regional hubs. City governments are centrally concerned with attracting and sustaining global investors. Johannesburg's urban competitiveness strategy, criticised a decade ago for singularity of purpose and therefore exclusion (Bremner 2004), has since been refined to embrace the poor and in particular to absorb urbanisation (Johannesburg 2006, 2011). At least in text, the strategy has a human face. Despite speaking to social concerns, and while requiring state investment (more so for the infrastructure demanded by global investment than for satisfaction of basic needs), such strategies follow tenets of what has been referred to as urban neoliberalism, creating the conditions for the globalised market to flourish (Shin and López-Morales 2011).

For Johannesburg, and for Gauteng's city region, the adoption of urban competitiveness, as Greenberg (2010:108) suggests, may be 'a defensive response by the state in the face of the growing power of transnational capital, rather than the proactive, visionary stance that it is often presented as'. For Lefebvre (1996/1968:127), such 'rationality' which was already rearing its head in the late 1960s, acknowledges the city 'only as an instrument and a means'. Whether this rationality is adopted proactively or defensively, the result today is an intensifying uneven competition over scarce urban land and over access to strategic, convenient and profitable location, along with a dependency on a well-policed private property regime.

City governance for urban competitiveness is concerned with managing not only access to urban land but also the mobility of people, expending resources to attract and hold on to a class that will service global investment (Turok 2004). Despite current city strategies' undertakings to absorb the poor and ensure African World Class Cities for All (Johannesburg 2006:83) evidence suggests efforts, if not political strategies, not to attract (or allow entry to) the poor or those superfluous to this economy (Huchzermeyer 2011). Anti-land invasion measures, outsourced to private security firms by several South African municipalities (Huchzermeyer 2011), paralleled by anti-street trading measures (Tolsi and Nxumalo 2013) motivated on the need to ensure sustainable, competitive and livable cities (SAFM 2013), play a key role in signaling unwelcome towards the poor. The result, if not purpose, is to build and maintain class-based privilege or elitism, to use a more politically imbued term. Those having to resort to informal means of living and making a living in South African cities, do so under conditions of considerable tension.

Across South Africa active informal settlement eradication coupled with land invasion control has repressed ordinary people's attempts to defy the exclusionary formal city. Johannesburg now has more than double the number of back yard shacks than shacks in informal settlements. A further one fifth of the number of households in informal settlements is estimated to be living in informal occupation of inner city buildings, largely hidden and often in worse conditions than in informal settlements or back yard shacks (Ahmed 2013). All this adds up to 36 per cent of the city's households living in unauthorized residential arrangements. Very few new informal settlements have been permitted to form since 2000 suggesting increasing pressure on existing shack settlements. In South Africa evictions of economically poor households saw an increase from the late 1990s, a plight brought to public attention through the Grootboom case in Cape Town with a ruling in the Constitutional Court in 2000, and the much publicized Bredell eviction on the East Rand in 2001. Evictions in this period resulted in the formation of 'new' social movements, such as the Anti-Eviction Campaign in 2000, the Landless People's Movement in 2001 (Ballard et al 2006) and Abahlali baseMjondolo in 2005 (Pithouse 2008). Of these, Abahlali, while also inspired by the radical humanism of Frantz Fanon (Gibson 2011, Zikode 2011), has become the most vocal in calling for a right to the city, through protests, press releases, statements and public lectures (Abahlali baseMjondolo 2010, 2013), with solidarity from right-to-the-city movements in cities such as New York. The state has considered the activities of these movements criminal, often treating them with violence and repression. Campaigns against police brutality are staged alongside increasingly frequent protests against corruption, broken promises, delays in service delivery and barriers to meaningful participation in decision making. The daily experience of over a third of the city's households of having to contradict the official logic of the city draws urgent attention to the inadequacy of city rights.

Demands for rights to the city

In South Africa, as in many former colonial countries, a struggle for a right to the city in literal terms formed an integral part of the fight against colonialism and apartheid. Pithouse (2013:333) writes about '[a] long history of popular struggle for a right to the city' in South Africa. Already in the 1940s, write Nieftagodien and Gaule (2012:12), 'direct action by poor black people could force the authorities to respond to their demands'. The incomplete victory over urban repression, the continuity of anti-urban and exclusionary forces, and for South Africa the inability of the state to overcome the highest urban inequality on the globe, mark the postcolonial urban condition, necessitating a renewed or continued struggle for rights to the city.

While in South Africa and in many colonies in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s the demand for a right to the city informed an evident struggle from below, unrelated to this Henri Lefebvre challenged dominant scholarly and political thinking in France by articulating and theorising a ‘right to the city’ in the late 1960s.<sup>2</sup> Translated into English only from 1996 (and still only in part), his ideas on the right to the city are now much debated and contested (eg Purcell 2002, Walsh 2013), many argue trivialised and corrupted (Mayer 2009, Souza 2010, Gibson 2011), but also applied in a variety of campaigns for a right to the city across the globe (Mayer 2009). While the right to the city literature on urban struggles in the north is largely theoretic globally based on aspects of Lefebvre’s writing (eg Purcell 2002, Kuymulu 2013), the more recent adoption of the right to the city discourse in the Anglophone Third World (though with exceptions), tends to apply the right to the city merely as a slogan or term, taking its meaning for granted (eg Patel et al 2012, Bhan 2009). The ambiguity in use of the concept has led some to consciously avoid reference to the ‘right to the city’ altogether (Benit-Gbaffou and Oldfield 2014).

Given recent use of the slogan ‘right to the city’ by international agencies such as UN-Habitat (Brown 2013) as well as the South African national Department of Human Settlements (2010) and a number of local organisations,<sup>3</sup> I would like to take us back to Lefebvre’s own writing. I will explore ways in which Lefebvre, though writing from a postwar European context, provides fitting but largely ignored concepts for an engagement with informal settlements and for constructive mobilization around the South African urban condition today.

Lefebvre must be understood as a Marxist scholar, but one who stretched boundaries and therefore was contested from many sides. In 1958 the French Communist Party expelled Lefebvre due to his opposition to authoritarianism; the Communist Party also frowned on his interest in the everyday (Smith 2003). Having focused first on everyday life in rural settings, ‘by the mid-1960s [Lefebvre] turned his attention to the urban everyday’ (Smith 2003:ix), a concept that informed his thinking on the right to the city and subsequent work on The Urban Revolution (Lefebvre 2003/1970), as well as The Production of Space (Lefebvre 1991/1974). Lefebvre’s interest in everyday life is an interest in ‘contradictory lived experience’; the everyday, in which consumption is central, is understood to play a critical role in the survival or endurance of capitalism, capitalism having deepened in urban everyday life as part of its post-colonial expansion (Kipfer 2002: 118, 127, 132).<sup>4</sup>

Marxism up to the 1970s had a tendency (though with exceptions) of avoiding any engagement with an urban future. In the Housing Question written in 1872, Engels proclaimed that '[t]o speculate as to how a future society would organise the distribution of food and dwellings leads directly to utopia' (Engels 1935/1887:101).<sup>5</sup> In the late 1980s Lefebvre (1996/1986:205) notes that 'Engels speaks of housing but very little of the city', and that

Marx himself never sought to reflect on the city. There are texts on the rural-urban relationship, but there is nothing on the city. He was far from thinking that the following century, our century would be that of the globalization of the city and of massive urbanization. (Ibid)

Criticising the later influence of the Chicago School, Lefebvre (Ibid) also traces its anti-urban influence through the Soviet, Chinese and Cuban revolutions. In the capitalist west, Marxists tended to associate the promotion of urban alternatives with reform, which itself was seen as an impediment to a more far-reaching revolution of the Soviet kind (Bodenschatz 1987).<sup>6</sup> Marxists also 'rejected the notion that the urban represented a specific social realm' as Neil Smith (2003:x) explains, whereas the social sciences at the time of Lefebvre's writing applied a 'technocratic' frame 'according to the impress of liberal policy requirements'. While pioneering the urban within Marxism, Lefebvre considered his contribution to Marxism to be his incorporation of the everyday (Kofman and Lebas 1996), which we will see articulated in his ideas on the 'right to the city' in particular through the concepts of habitat and inhabiting, and the importance of the lived experience and space.

Lefebvre's approach

In Marxist tradition, Lefebvre applies a dialectic approach, using opposing arguments, or contradictions. Kofman and Lebas (1996:10) explain Lefebvre's dialectical approach as one that is more open than that of Marx, 'bringing together the conflictual and contradictory, and linking theory and practice', also revealing 'the continual movement between' terms. In this sense, he also 'criticized static binary modes' (one could use the example of the often criticised binary formal/informal employed in the term 'informal settlements' or 'informal trade'), suggesting instead triads, upon which dialectical thought could be brought to bear (Kofman and Lebas 1996:10).<sup>7</sup> Lefebvre explains the importance of the dialectic approach at a time when there is a reluctance to analyse contradictions and instead a favour for 'logical thought' and 'nothing but coherence'. His criticism of 'urbanism as a body of doctrine' is that 'it evacuates dialectical thought ... in other words internal contradictions, both old and new' (Lefebvre 2003/1970:171).

In his dialectical approach, Lefebvre notes that mass housing provides a freedom (that of 'independent life') which no one would disagree should be granted to each individual; but, he argues, at the same time, this is 'appropriated by the state for strategic purposes'. He criticizes the dormitory character of modern housing provision (Lefebvre 1971/1968:151). He predicts that the 'consequences of "massification" [may] simply become overwhelming' with the result that 'faintly outlined rights will be swept away' (Lefebvre 1971/1968:152). Having replaced 'slums', which were on 'the lowest possible threshold of tolerability', mass housing was reaching 'the lowest possible threshold of sociability' (Lefebvre 1991/1974:316, emphasis in the original). Lefebvre, whose work evolved from one publication to the next,<sup>8</sup> initially refers to the need, 'soon', to reformulate the freedoms related to housing 'as the freedom of the city' (Lefebvre 1971/1968, emphasis in the original). In the same work (Everyday Life in the Modern World) he posits that the 'urban experience and in particular the struggle for the city (for its preservation and restoration, for the freedom of the city) provide the setting and objectives for a number of revolutionary actions' (Lefebvre 1971/1968:205, emphasis in the original).

Lefebvre later articulates a 'right to the city' as 'a superior form of rights: right to freedom, to individualization in socialization, to habitat and to inhabit' (Lefebvre 1996/1968:173). Further, the much quoted line: '[t]he right to the oeuvre, to participation and appropriation [clearly distinct from the right to property] are implied in the right to the city' (1996/1968:174). But his conception of a right to the city cannot be limited to just these dimensions. Lefebvre also refers to the 'right to urban life, to renewed centrality, to places of encounter and exchange, to life rhythms and time uses, enabling the complete usage of these moments and places' (1996/1968:179). He identifies this right to the city as a right 'in the making' (1996/1968:179), thus an open concept for future generations to take forward.<sup>9</sup>

Lefebvre not only dared, as a Marxist, to take seriously the everyday and use this to draw normative attention to the urban future, while challenging the social sciences likewise to embrace urban society and the everyday; in his concept of a right to the city he also incorporated and stretched two liberal notions: humanism and rights. On both fronts he is criticized by Marxists.

Humanism, creativity and ‘to inhabit’

Lefebvre calls for an ‘effort to reach out towards a new humanism, a new praxis, another man, that of urban society’ (Lefebvre 1996/1968:150). Lefebvre sets this ‘new humanism’ apart from the ‘old classical and liberal humanism’ which ‘wishes to build to the “human scale”’, drawing its ‘idealism ... from agrarian models’, and obsessed with or devoted to form and aesthetics (Lefebvre 1996/1968:83). In a recent article, Grindon (2013:209) shows how Lefebvre engages with the language of liberal humanism, but ‘employing Marxist theory critically to make use of and open up central categories in humanist thought: of subject, creative labour and art’. In Lefebvre’s conception of a right to the city, Marxist humanism is translated into the oeuvre, the creative as opposed to productive (or profit-motivated) work (Lefebvre 1996/1968).<sup>10</sup>

Lefebvre’s engagement with people’s desire for creative work and incorporation of this into his conceptualisation of a right to the city has lent him the label of ‘romantic’, particularly by Marxist scholars.<sup>11</sup> Thus, while Lefebvre is criticized by some, Gavin Grindon explains that he is recognised for his ‘Marxist leveraging of the humanist terms of poetry, creativity and man’ (Grindon 2013:217) into a ‘revolutionary romanticism’ (2013:219). This has involved a ‘sustained engagement with the role of the aesthetic in social change’ (2013:208). Lefebvre continued this emphasis in The Production of Space, which he published in French in 1974. There he articulates ‘a “revolution of space” (subsuming the “urban revolution”)', in which he foresees ‘great inventiveness and creativity’ (Lefebvre 1991/1974:419).

Lefebvre drew the term ‘poetry’ or the Greek word ‘poiesis’ into his discourse on expression through housing and the city (Grindon 2013:210). In Greek, this term ‘originally referred to making or creation, and only with its transmission into Latin did this become limited to literary creation’ (2013:210). For Lefebvre, ‘poiesis’ therefore refers to the creation of ‘oeuvres’ or creative work (Grindon 2013:210). Developing a conceptual triangle, Lefebvre closely associates home, language and poetry, aligning this to urban reality, discourse and poetry; ‘The “human being” cannot do anything but inhabit as poet. If we do not provide him with ... the possibility of inhabiting poetically or even inventing a poetry, he will create it as best he can’ (Lefebvre 2003/1970:82). Exceptions that Lefebvre provides do not stem from material poverty, but from excessive commodification, ‘exchange having abolished use or overdetermined it’ (2003/1970: 83). Thus for Lefebvre ‘[t]he logic of the market’ has ‘suppressed the city as oeuvre’, by reducing urban qualities to exchange (Kofman and Lebas 1996:19).

In Lefebvre’s notion of the right to the city, one finds a fluid continuity between his use of the terms oeuvre, appropriation, to inhabit, use value, urban society, centrality, complexity and difference. Each is used to explain the other, and each has an opposite (see Table 1). Neil Smith (2003:xxi) helps us see these opposites not as binaries, but as ‘exaggerated opposites’ with the purpose of forcing ‘the dialectic forward’. The oeuvre is contrasted by products (created for exchange) (Lefebvre 1996/1968:75); appropriation of space is contrasted by spatial domination (Lefebvre 1991/1974:164); to inhabit is contrasted by the habitat (planned and delivered, devoid of any participation by the occupant) (1996/1968:76, drawing on Heidegger); use value is contrasted by ‘exchange value’ (1996/1968:75); urban reality by industrial reality (1996/1968:70); centrality by dispersion (2003/1970:125), complexity by reduction (1991/1974:105), and ‘differences’ by ‘homogeneity’ (1996/1968:127). Neither exists without its opposite, yet what Lefebvre criticises is the dominance of the latter over the former.

Table 1.: Attributes of the city, with their mostly dominating opposites presented in bold

The oeuvre	Product
Appropriation	Spatial domination
To inhabit	Habitat
Use value	Exchange value
Urban society	Industrial society
Centrality	Dispersion
Complexity	Reduction
Difference	Homogeneity

Source: Compiled from Lefebvre (1991/1974, 1996/1968, 2003/1970)

The French city at his time of writing was dominated by products and exchange value, and by ‘two orders of urgency’, on the one hand leading to the planned and mass-produced habitats marked by dispersion, repetition and uniformity, and on the other hand ‘industrial organization and global planning’ (Lefebvre 1996/1968:177), thus ‘passing over the city and the urban’ (1996/1968:123). Combined, products, industrial organisation, habitat, dispersion, reduction and uniformity do not bring about cities. Therefore, what needs to be invoked is a right to the city as an oeuvre, to the process of appropriation and inhabiting, to urban society marked by encounter, centralities, complexity and difference.

Lefebvre (2003/1970:125) accepts that there can be no equality in a city; he contrasts the segregation or dispersion of contemporary urbanism with the hierarchy (in essence inequality) created by centrality. However (and this is misunderstood in the right to the city literature – eg Walsh 2013), Lefebvre does not simply equate centrality with the physical centre of a town or city. ‘Virtually, anything is possible anywhere’, argues Lefebvre. ‘A crowd can gather, objects can pile up, a festival unfold, an event – terrifying or pleasant – can occur. This is why urban space is so fascinating: centrality is always possible’ (Lefebvre 2003/1970:130). And so Lefebvre imagines ‘[a] space taken over by the ephemeral. So that every place becomes multifunctional, polyvalent, transfunctional, with an incessant turnover of functions; where groups take control of spaces for expressive actions and constructions, which are soon destroyed’ (2003/1970: 130-131).<sup>12</sup>

Informal or shack settlements make a compelling example. The images in Figure 1 are of Isiqalo in Philippi, Cape Town, an informal settlement that emerged over several months, as the potential for quarrying of building sand from this site was being exhausted. A quarry turned multifunctional – part quarry, part home, crèche, market, place of expression, place of encounter. It has had no tenure security and since inception has been directly under eviction threats. A defense against eviction, in this case by the Socio-Economic Rights Institute of South Africa (SERI) and the Legal Resources Centre (LRC) (Gamble 2013), became (though not consciously so) a defense for the right to the city in a particular Lefebvrian sense of centrality.

While Lefebvre does engage with informal settlements, and I return to that below, in his discussion of the emergence or creation of centrality of the ephemeral kind, he uses a very different illustration. What he refers to as an ‘admirable example’ is a large exhibition space in Montreal: ‘An ephemeral city rose up from a transformed site, a magnificent city, where everydayness was absorbed in festival...’ (Lefebvre 2003/1970:130).

Figure 1.: Isiqalo informal settlement in Cape Town
(photographs by the author, 2013)

Lefebvre embraces the temporal or ephemeral, which resonates with what has been labeled ‘informal’ in cities like Johannesburg. However, he is very clear that ‘[t]he right to the city cannot be conceived of as a simple visiting right’ (Lefebvre 1996/1968:158, emphasis in the original), ie something temporary. This can be interpreted to speak to the informal in a different way, emphasising the need not to treat self-made and self-managed settlements as something to be wiped out in future, removed or relocated.<sup>13</sup> But when considering the inappropriateness of mere ‘visiting rights’ to the city, Lefebvre (1996/1968:158) resorts to the example of the short term enjoyment of city rights by tourists who have a nostalgia for the traditional city imbued with art and monuments (and not those forcefully or economically excluded from a permanent residence and livelihood in the city). But, Lefebvre uses the example of tourism to illustrate more. He contrasts the ‘contemplative passivity’ that involves consuming ‘signs, displays, products and even works of art ... of past ages’ (as middle class tourist do) with ‘creative activity’ (Lefebvre 1971/1968:196).

Throughout, Lefebvre takes issue with a ‘reductive process’ whether in the acts of passive consumption (as in tourism) or in the ‘praxis’, the professional identification of urban problems and the definition of solutions (Lefebvre 1971/1968:196). He warns of the potential ‘abuse of reductionism’ (1991/1974:106). He asks ‘to whom should we delegate power and the representation of practical and social life?’ (2003/1970:188), or ‘[w]ho has the right to synthesis?’ (1996/1968:132) – who has the right to distilling what is important and what should be left out in representations of the city on which plans, strategies and budgets are based.

Urban form and habitat

Lefebvre associates the term ‘urbanization’ less with quantitative growth of cities than with ‘development’ and ‘social life’, in contrast to ‘industrialization’ which he associates with ‘growth’ and ‘economic production’ (1996/1968:70). David Harvey (1991:439) explains that ‘in Lefebvre’s thought’, ‘urbanization and the production of space are interlinked’. Thus Lefebvre refers to a ‘paradox’ when urbanisation (the expansion of the urban fabric) occurs in the dominant suburban form, ‘de-urbanized’, devoid of social life (Lefebvre 1996/1968:78), commodified, primarily serving speculation (Lefebvre 1996/1968:79). Here the term ‘habitat’ applies. However, the concept of habitat (as opposed to inhabiting), Lefebvre (1996/1968:79) argues, is ‘brought to its purest form by a state bureaucracy’, when ‘public and semi-public initiatives’ are driven by ‘simply the goal of providing as quickly as possible at the least cost, the greatest possible number of housing units’. South African cities have ample examples of such habitats, something about which the South African planning literature has raised concerns [RDP mass housing] (Harrison 2002, Todes 2009). While Lefebvre nevertheless acknowledges small margins ‘of initiative and freedom to inhabit’ in these estates – the freedom to choose one’s fence and design one’s garden (Lefebvre 1996/1968:79) – he argues that ‘never has the relationship of the “human being” with the world ... experienced such profound misery as during the reign of habitat and so-called “urbanistic” rationality’ (Lefebvre 2003/1970:83).

In a very simplistic way one could argue along the lines of John Turner’s ‘housing as a verb’ (Turner 1972), that habitat is the noun and inhabit the process, the verb, inscribing dweller involvement. However, ‘[f]or Lefebvre, it was not the home, but the city, which expressed and symbolized a person’s being and consciousness’ (Kofman and Lebas 1996:7-8).

Lefebvre’s ‘to inhabit’, as opposite of ‘habitat’, invokes in us images such as the Isiqalo settlement (Figure 1 above). Lefebvre (1996/1968:79) refers to: ‘the notion of inhabit, that is the plasticity of space, its modeling and the appropriation by groups and individuals of the conditions of their existence’. In later writing, Lefebvre (1991/1974:165) explains the ‘highest expression’ of appropriation ‘is the work of art’; thus ‘[a]n appropriated space [and we may think of Isiqalo] resembles a work of art’. The work of art is key to Lefebvre’s definition of the city, ‘a place where different groups can meet, where they may be in conflict but also form alliances, and where they participate in a collective oeuvre’ (Lefebvre 1996/1986:207).

Lefebvre’s concepts of dominance over appropriated space and destruction of collective works of art evoke in us very recent images of government campaigns against informal settlements and street traders. Lefebvre (1996/1968:79) talks of planning practice that has ‘set itself against the city and the urban to eradicate them’. Later Lefebvre uses the term ‘negative appropriation’, particularly in relation to spatial prohibitions inscribed in space, and partly underpinned by law (Lefebvre 1991/1974:319, cited in Butler 2009). As South African cities have witnessed for over a century, the victims of shack and informal trading prohibitions and demolitions have no choice but to reconstruct their structures ‘illegally’, if not in the same places then elsewhere. In later writing, Lefebvre (1991/1974:168) provides us with the fitting concept of ‘a reappropriation which can call but a temporary halt to domination’.<sup>14</sup>

While Lefebvre (1996/1968:180) suggests that the ‘precious deposit’, the ‘sense of the oeuvre’ can be found in philosophy and in art, he also acknowledges that the ‘urban [that is the oeuvre, the practice of inhabiting, moments of centrality and difference] ... survives in the fissures of planned and programmed order’ (1996/1968:129). This allows us to assume that if Lefebvre had written today, from a country like South Africa, far surpassing the ‘violent contrasts between wealth and poverty’ which he wrote about in the 1960s (1996/1968:67), he might have more directly referred to informal settlements as a deposit of ‘the sense of the oeuvre’. In The Production of Space, published in French seven years after The Right to the City, Lefebvre does venture in this direction: He writes that in ‘[t]he vast shanty towns of Latin America ... [a]ppropriation of a remarkably high order is found’ (Lefebvre 1991/1974:373, 374).<sup>15</sup> These settlements, though marked by real inadequacies, ‘manifest in social life far more intense than the bourgeois districts of the cities’ (1991/1974:373). However, ‘social life’ in these settlements ‘only survives inasmuch as it fights in self-defense and goes on the attack in the course of class struggle in its modern forms’ (1991/1974: 373). Lefebvre refers to a ‘nervous admiration’ which the effective ordering of these spaces, with ‘spontaneous architecture and planning’ elicit (1991/1974:374). Adding to our understanding of the tension in which these shack settlements exist, Lefebvre suggests that this ‘extraordinary spatial duality’ will persist and weaken ‘dominated space’ (1991/1974:374).

Pointing us in the direction of a dialectic on urban informality, which I’ve previously attempted to conceptualise as a field of tension (Huchzermeyer 2011:72), Lefebvre (1996/1968:125) describes how dispossessed rural peasants, ‘eager for change’, are pushed ‘towards the cities’, to shantytowns that become ‘the (inadequate) mediator[s] between town and country’, offering ‘a substitute of urban life, miserable yet intense’. And if these miserable but intense places are sanitised or replaced from above by habitats, ‘[t]he satisfaction of basic needs is unable to kill the disaffection of fundamental desires (or of the fundamental desire)’ captured in the right to the city (Lefebvre 1996/1968:129).

The notion of rights

Bearing in mind that the ‘rights discourse’ is ‘deeply embedded in the liberal capitalist tradition’ (Kuymulu 2013:927), what then does Lefebvre invoke when framing his complex dialectic on the city first as a ‘struggle’ and a ‘freedom’ and later as a ‘right’? No doubt, the notion of a right highlights the indispensable, while also implying a claim or entitlement. This in turn focuses the collective effort to confront the urban contradictions that Lefebvre articulates. He identifies a necessary progression from ‘aspirations faintly tinted with assertiveness’, from ‘values’ to ‘facts’ and to these being ‘acknowledged as rights’, until ‘social recognition becomes inevitable’ (Lefebvre 1971/1968:152). This means that with the growing interest globally today in the ‘right to the city’ as coined by Lefebvre (and, in contexts such as South Africa, with continued longstanding struggles for city rights), and with the collective drafting of World Charter on the Right to the City (International Alliance of Inhabitants 2005), a stage of growing social recognition could be acknowledged. But this should also be steered back to Lefebvre’s key concepts rather than being dismissed as a mere fashion.

As already mentioned, Lefebvre (1996/1968:173, 174) understood the right to the city to be ‘a superior form of rights’. While some authors grapple with the vagueness of rights in Lefebvre’s right to the city (Attoh 2011), Harvey (2008) understands the right to the city as a human right, but one of a different type, ‘far more than the individual liberty to access urban resources: it is a right to change ourselves by changing the city. It is, moreover, a common rather than an individual right since this transformation inevitably depends upon the exercise of a collective power to reshape the processes of urbanization’ (Ibid:23). The context today in which Harvey refers to the right to the city as a human right is one in which, as O’Connell (2011:537) explains, ‘the neoliberal worldview is ... antagonistic to the recognition and protection of socio-economic rights at a foundational level’, thus undermining the liberal-capitalist post-war human rights regime for which the United Nations (UN) was established and which achieved a certain level of social recognition globally. The volatility of our human rights framework is evident in the fact that the UN’s own Millennium Development Goals initiative has been antagonistic to socio-economic rights, reluctant to articulate duties for the state and eager to avoid political implications (Nelson 2007).

There is a position on the left that is uncomfortable with ‘the deployment’ of a rights discourse, be this through the right to the city, as this may subvert ‘the social antagonisms at the heart of capitalism’ by turning them into ‘demands for recognition from capital itself’ (Walsh 2013:407). Calling for the right to the city in a Lefebvrian sense requires consciousness of this danger, as was carefully articulated, for instance, by the social movement Abahlali baseMjondolo, when engaging pro bono lawyers in an effort to overturn the KwaZulu-Natal Elimination and Prevention of Re-emergence of Slums Bill of 2006 and Act of 2007. With its focus on what is ‘close and real to the people’, Abahlali baseMjondolo (2007:2) took care ‘not to let the enemy’s approaches and language dominate us’. The KZN Slums Act, which unconstitutionally increased the state’s powers to evict, was in a Lefebvrian sense an instrument for the domination of space (ultimately in favour of deepening the reach of capitalism in the everyday), an instrument for negative appropriation, and for preventing even temporary re-appropriation.

Despite success in the court, Abahlali at the same time experienced the state and ruling party’s determination at spatial domination (as a political strategy) on two fronts. Firstly through a violent late night attack on its base in the Kennedy Road informal settlement in Durban and immediate establishment of an African National Congress (ANC) base (Chance 2010, Huchzermeyer 2011:220-2, Pithouse 2013:342-4). Secondly, the City and Provincial governments immediately abandoned the in situ upgrading plans Abahlali had negotiated for several of the settlements it represented, promising instead the delivery of individual freestanding mass housing to the remaining residents of Kennedy Road informal settlement. The authorities have since resorted back to in situ upgrading for Kennedy Road, but the exclusive channeling of development through the party appears deliberately intended to weaken the movement. In this context of violent repression, Abahlali baseMjondolo (2010:1) argue that ‘if there is a “right to the city”, it is a very difficult right to actually get’. The movement also speaks of the ‘very high price’ it is paying ‘to access any meaningful and broader idea of our right to the city’ (2010). Facing a resurgence of violent repression in 2013, Abahlali issued a press statement announcing protest action with a series of demands summarised as ‘our right to the city is not negotiable’, linking this directly to dignity and participation in democracy (Abahlali baseMjondolo 2013). Further: ‘our crime has been to speak truth to power... to insist that everyone counts... to insist on our right to the cities’ (2013). Already in 2006, invoking the right to synthesis, Abahlali’s president S’bu Zikode stated ‘our lives are the ignored truth of this society’ (Zikode 2008:119). On November 12, 2013, Zikode (2013) writes in The Guardian ‘[w]hen Abahlali baseMjondolo members take our place in cities we take it humbly, but firmly’.

The Abahlali case on the KZN Slums Act culminating in the Constitutional Court in 2009, along with others that reached the same Court from organised shack dwellers in the same year, dealt with the right not to be evicted, not to be relocated from places of centrality to the periphery (or not to be dispersed) and the right to be meaningfully engaged in decision making in relation to housing or Lefebvre's concept of 'habitat' (Huchzermeyer 2011). This litigation can be summarised as being merely in defense of the erosion of incomplete rights to the city, thus speaking to the state's duty to respect and protect rather than its duty to promote rights (Huchzermeyer 2011). While these cases did not engage the Court directly on issues of creativity, the process of inhabiting, or the collective oeuvre, they were in defense of appropriation, of an existence 'in the fissures of planned and programmed order' (Lefebvre 1996/1968:129), against the domination of space through the imposition of a uniform habitat with minimal scope for the process of inhabiting. The legal arguments were carefully crafted in solidarity with organised shack dweller groups. No doubt an increase in 'social recognition' of the complete meaning of the right to the city could result in far more litigation taking on the growing contradictions or tensions within which informal settlements find themselves in South African cities today.

Concrete proposals

A much referred to position in Lefebvre's work on the right to the city is that this right can only be brought about by 'groups, social classes and class fractions capable of revolutionary initiative' (Lefebvre 1996/1968:154). A dominant notion in the literature is that the right has to be asserted from below, by social movements (Harvey 2008, Mayer 2009). Indeed, calling for a reversal of roles Lefebvre argues: 'Only the taking in charge by the working class of planning and its political agenda can profoundly modify social life and open another era: that of socialism in neo-capitalist countries' (Lefebvre 1996/1968:179).<sup>16</sup> However, Lefebvre is typically open-ended on the question: who can bring about a right to the city?

While Lefebvre argues that the right to the city must be asserted from below, he does remind us of a historic era in which the city was the oeuvre of 'certain historical and social "agents"' (Lefebvre 1996/1968:103). In the western Middle Ages, these agents were 'merchants and bankers' who 'acted to promote exchange and generalize it, to extend the domain of exchange value; and yet for them the city was much more use value than exchange value. These merchants... loved their cities like a work of art and adorned them with every kind of works of art' (1996/1968:101-102). In such cities use dominated over profit (1996/1968:102).

Thus Lefebvre writes, '[t]he pressure of the working class has been and remains necessary (but not sufficient) for the recognition of these rights, for their entry into customs, for their inscription into codes which are still incomplete' (Lefebvre 1996/1968:157). He implies that authorities need 'a sense and a taste of the oeuvre, especially in architecture and urban design' (1996/1968:75). 'Urbanism' (as a profession) should 'try to model space as a work of art' (Lefebvre 2003/1970:180). The 'sense of the oeuvre' must be shared also by ordinary people, or else 'urban consciousness will vanish' (Lefebvre 1996/1968:77). In this sense, Gilbert and Dikeç (2008:261) suggest that the right to the city may be understood as 'a new societal ethics'.

Beyond this broad conscientisation that is necessary, Lefebvre also engages with approaches to urban strategy. He calls for 'a reversal of the conventional way of looking at things' (Lefebvre, 2003/1970:139). At his time of writing, the central concern in urban strategies was to optimize industrialization – today it is the optimization of urban competitiveness. Strategies, Lefebvre argues, should not be based on the need for such optimization and then to manage the consequences (2003/1970). Lefebvre gives a central role to the 'critique of the everyday' (2003/1970:139), of 'a social environment of sophisticated exploitation and carefully controlled passivity' (2003/1970:140). 'In showing how people live, the critique of everyday life builds an indictment of the strategies that lead to that result'; noting the 'clumsy and unenlightened efforts to formulate and resolve some of the problems of urban society'. Lefebvre instead alerts us to the possibility that 'full knowledge momentarily focused on a problematic becomes political' and that knowledge and the political be combined into urban strategy (2003/1970:141). This leads him to three points: firstly, that the 'urban problematic' must be introduced into 'political life by moving it into the foreground'; secondly, that 'urban self-management' [in contrast to mere participation (Lefebvre 1996/1978:145)] be promoted both in industry (with implications for 'markets and the control of investments'), and in 'urban life'; and thirdly, that 'a contractual system of a "right to the city"' be 'enlarged, transformed, [and] concretized' – 'the right not to be excluded from centrality and its movement' (Lefebvre 1996/1978:150). [1996 or 2003?]

Drawing on a much wider reading of Lefebvre's work, beyond his urban texts and those translated into English, Elden (2004:226) explains the direct connection in Lefebvre's conception of self-management (in French autogestion, also meaning self-government), and direct democracy, 'moving beyond "mere representation"', with knowledge and control being central'.<sup>17</sup> Within this, a 'reformulated understanding of citizenship ... would include rethinking of rights' forming 'a basis for a reorientation of the state' (2004:226).

In France where Lefebvre's urban texts were read as they came off the press, and in countries closely aligned intellectually such as Brazil,<sup>18</sup> it is precisely these pointers for urban strategy that found their way into municipal policies and programmes (and in Brazil into municipal laws) through the opposition left taking control of individual municipalities (in France in the 1970s, in Brazil in the course of the political opening in the 1980s). In both countries, the left promoted democratic participation and self-management (in Brazil auto-gestão and mutirão) (Souza 2003, Rolnik and Cymbalista 2003, Kofman and Lebas 1996). In France 'a renewed sense of urbanity' was drawn from Lefebvre, with interventions such as 'the introduction of centrality into the peripheral zones and the transformation of suburbs into real cities'. In France, a 1988 Policy on the City drew on Lefebvre's writing (Kofman and Lebas 1996:36). A French Ministry of the City which was created in 1991, and its first minister would refer to Lefebvre's 1968 book Right to the City (Kofman and Lebas 1996). Fernandes (2007) shows how a wide range of Lefebvre's writing, accessible to Brazilian scholars, social movements and politicians, inspired the Movement for Urban Reform and, through this, urban policy and law in the 1980s and 1990s, until inscription into the City Statute in 2001 and the formation of a Ministry of Cities in 2003 (Fernandes 2006). Fernandes (2007) shows that despite real advances, this is, however, only, a beginning to overcoming Brazil's urban contradictions manifested in the ongoing informal production of space.

Conclusion

Lefebvre's right to the city provides us with both analytical tools and concrete approaches with which to confront the informal settlement situation in South African cities today. Analytically, Lefebvre recommends taking the lived experience (and those living) in informal settlements seriously. He calls for the recognition of the contradictions that bring about informal means of living, and of the deepening of these contradictions. This also entails recognition and valuing of the urban life and form that emerges outside of, in spite of or under threat of, the spatial prohibitions of the state. Lefebvre suggests these be understood as processes of political domination, which in turn explain the incompleteness of city rights and their ongoing erosion, as well as the struggles necessary for accessing any right to appropriation, to inhabit, to the creation of centralities and collective works of art. A broad societal ethic on the right to the city, as has been adopted by the social movement Abahlali baseMjondolo, must seek to assert the collective oeuvre over the state's strategic drives for urban competitiveness, through concrete demands for self-management and direct democracy.

Notes

1. This paper was presented as an Inaugural Lecture in the School of Architecture and Planning, Faculty of Engineering and the Built Environment, University of the Witwatersrand, on November 12, 2013. I would like to acknowledge incisive comments on the draft, received from Christoph Haferburg, Kristen Kornienko, Richard Pithouse and my late father Fritz Huchzermeyer.
2. This formed part of his larger work on the production of space, which spanned six books (Stanek 2011:25).
3. Isandla Institute (see Görgens and van Donk 2012), Development Action Group (DAG) (see DAG 2010).
4. Both continuity and evolution of thought is evident through these books. As his work was not translated into English chronologically nor in its totality, its impact has been piecemeal in the Anglophone urban theory and action.
5. All emphases in the quotes are in the original.
6. Lefebvre (1991/1974:383) himself refers to 'the ironclad distinction between 'reform' and 'revolution' which is 'overwhelmed' by 'the quest for' alternative urban space or 'counter-space'.
7. In The Production of Space, the 'triad' of lived, conceived and perceived space is a central theme; that is the contrast between the spatial practice of daily routines, space as represented by planners and other professionals, and space as made sense of and imagined by inhabitants (Lefebvre 1991/1974:39).
8. With one book having followed so closely on the next, and with publication delays, it is not always evident which of Lefebvre's text was written first and which followed.
9. Mitchell and Heynen (2009:616) highlight the 'capaciousness' or wide scope of Lefebvre's right to the city.
10. Earlier translators of Lefebvre's subsequent book The Production of Space use the English word 'work' instead of 'oeuvre' (Lefebvre 1991/1974:73).
11. Castells in his early writing (Smith 2003), and recently Walsh (2013).
12. Later Lefebvre (1991/1974:332) reinforces this point by writing that 'centrality is moveable'.
13. Lefebvre (2003/1970:109) uses the term 'deported'.
14. Lefebvre (1991/1974:168) refers to unsuccessful 'communitarian experiments' of the late 1960s and early 1970s, groups taking up residence in places that were designed for other uses.

15. Shields (1999:183) mentions that Lefebvre at some point visited and stayed in Brazilian favelas.
16. Footnote: Lefebvre's own concern in the late 1980s, almost 20 years after having first written on the right to the city, was 'the passivity of people': 'The city is changing around them and they accept it, internalize it and bear the consequences' (Lefebvre 1996/1989:210). He associates this passivity in part with people's attachment to property, projecting that 'private ownership of land and property ... will continue to grow more powerful' (1996/1989:210); at the same time, he witnesses, though with uncertainty, 'a renewed interest in the urban' (1996/1989:210).
17. Perhaps a hint of this is in the concept of people-driven development articulated in the election manifesto of the ANC Alliance in 1994 (ANC 1994), which soon disappeared from the political discourse.
18. Many Brazilian academics and urban professionals studied in France and were therefore directly exposed to intellectual debates in France.

References

- Abahlali baseMjondolo (2007) 'Abahlali baseMjondolo meeting to discuss legal and political strategies to oppose the Slums Bill'. Abahlali baseMjondolo, Durban. <http://abahlali.org/node/1700> (accessed September 12, 2010).
- (2010) 'The high cost of the right to the city'. Notes from a meeting of Abahlali baseMjondolo in preparation for the World Urban Forum: 'The Right to the City'. March. Durban. <http://abahlali.org/node/6398> (accessed September 12, 2010).
- (2013) 'March on the Durban City Hall to demand land, housing and dignity'. Press statement, September 13.
- Ahmed, Peter (2013) 'Reconsidering informality and growth within the city'. City of Johannesburg, class presentation, School of Architecture and Planning, University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, June 11.
- African National Congress (1994) 'Reconstruction and Development Programme: a policy framework'. African National Congress, Johannesburg.
- Attoh, Kafui (2011) 'What kind of a right is the right to the city?', Progress in Human Geography 35(5).
- Ballard, Richard, Adam Habib, Imraan Valodia and Elke Zuern (2006) 'Introduction: from anti-apartheid to post-apartheid social movements', in Richard Ballard, Adam Habib and Imraan Valodia (eds) Voices of Protest: social movements in post-apartheid South Africa. Pietermaritzburg: UKZN Press.
- Bar of South Africa. General Council (2013) 'Press Statement'. September 23, Johannesburg.

- Bénit-Gbaffou, Claire and Sophie Oldfield (2014) 'Claiming "rights" in the African city: popular mobilisation and the politics of informality in Nairobi, Rabat, Johannesburg and Cape Town', in Susan Parnell and Sophie Oldfield (eds) Routledge Handbook of Cities of the South. London: Routledge.
- Bhan, Gautam (2009) "'This is no longer the city I once knew": evictions, the urban poor and the right to the city in millennial Delhi', Environment and Urbanization 21(1).
- Bodenschatz, Harald (1987) Platz Frei für das Neue Berlin! Geschichte der stadterneuerung. Berlin: Transit.
- Bremner, Lindsay (2004) Johannesburg: one city colliding worlds. Johannesburg: STE Publishers.
- Brown, Alison (2013) 'The right to the city: road to Rio 2010', International Journal of Urban and Regional Research 37(3).
- Butler, Chris (2009) 'Critical legal studies and the politics of space', Social and Legal Studies 18(3).
- Chance, Kerry (2010) 'The work of violence: a timeline of armed attacks at Kennedy Road'. University of KwaZulu-Natal. School of Development Studies Research Report 83.
- Development Action Group (DAG) (2010) "'Re-imagining the City": a new urban order'. National Conference Report. October 11-13. Cape Town.
- Edigheji, Omano (ed) (2010) Constructing a Democratic Developmental State in South Africa: potentials and pitfalls. Cape Town: HSRC Press.
- Elden, Stuart (2004) Understanding Lefebvre: theory and the possible. New York: Continuum.
- Engels, Friedrich (1935 [1887]) The Housing Question. London: Martin Lawrence.
- Fernandes, Edesio (2006) 'Principles, bases and challenges of the National Programme to Support Sustainable Urban Land Regularisation in Brazil', in Marie Huchzermeyer and Aly Karam (eds) Informal Settlements: a perpetual challenge? Cape Town: University of Cape Town Press.
- (2007) 'Constructing the 'Right to the City' in Brazil', Social and Legal Studies 16(2).
- Gamble, [Justice] P (2013) 'Robert Ross Demolitions Pty (Ltd), and Unlawful Occupiers of the Remainder of Portion 20 Farm 787 Cape Division, and Province of the Western Cape, and City of Cape Town'. Case No. 1591/2012. June 3, Cape Town: Western Cape High Court.
- Gibson, Nigel (2011) Fanonian Practices in South Africa: from Steve Biko to Abahlali baseMjondolo. New York: Palgrave MacMillan; Pietermaritzburg: University of KwaZulu-Natal Press.

- Gilbert, Liette and Mustafa Dikeç (2008) 'Right to the city: politics of citizenship', in Kanishka Goonewardena, Stefan Kipfer, Richard Milgrom and Christian Schmidt (eds) Space, Difference, Everyday Life: reading Henri Lefebvre. London: Routledge.
- Görgens, Tristan and Mirjam van Donk (2012) 'Exploring the potential of the "Right to the City" to integrate the vision and practice of civil society in the struggle for the socio-spatial transformation of South African cities'. Isandla Institute, unpublished conference paper, 'Strategies to Overcome Poverty and Inequality: Towards Carnegie III' conference, September 3-7.
- Greenberg, Stephen (2010) 'The Gauteng City-Region: private and public power in the shaping of the city', Politikon 37(1).
- Grindon, Gavin (2013) 'Revolutionary romanticism: Henri Lefebvre's revolution-as-festival', Third Text 27(2).
- Harrison, Philip (2002) 'On the edge of reason: planning and the future of Southern African cities'. Inaugural Lecture, University of the Witwatersrand. School of Architecture and Planning, Johannesburg.
- Harvey, David (1991) 'Afterword', in Henri Lefebvre, The Production of Space. Oxford: Blackwell.
- (2008) 'The right to the city', New Left Review NS 53.
- Huchzermeyer, Marie (2011) Cities with 'Slums': from informal settlement eradication to a right to the city in Africa. Cape Town: University of Cape Town Press.
- International Alliance of Inhabitants (2005) 'World Charter on the Right to the City'. Revision in preparation for Barcelona, September. International Alliance of Inhabitants.
- Iveson, Kurt (2013) 'Cities within the city: do-it-yourself urbanism and the right to the city', International Journal of Urban and Regional Research 37(3).
- Johannesburg (2006) 'Growth and Development Strategy'. Johannesburg: City of Johannesburg.
- Johannesburg (2011) 'Joburg GDS 2040 Strategy'. Johannesburg: City of Johannesburg.
- Kipfer, Stefan (2002) 'Urbanization, everyday life and the survival of capitalism: Lefebvre, Gramsci and the problematic of hegemony', Capitalism, Nature, Socialism 13(2).
- Kofman, Elenore and Elizabeth Lebas (1996) 'Lost in transposition – time, space and the city. Introduction to Henri Lefebvre', in Lefebvre, Henri, Writings on Cities, Oxford: Blackwell.

- Kuymulu, Mehmet (2013) 'The vortex of rights: "Right to the City" at a crossroads', International Journal of Urban and Regional Research 37(3).
- Lefebvre, Henri (1971 [1968]) Everyday Life in the Modern World. London: Allen Lane.
- (1991 [1974]) The Production of Space. Oxford: Blackwell.
- (1996 [1968-1989]) Writings on the City. Oxford: Blackwell.
- (2003 [1970]) The Urban Revolution. London: University of Minnesota Press.
- Mayer, Margit (2009) 'The "Right to the City" in the context of shifting mottos of urban social movements', City: analysis of urban trends, culture, theory, policy, action 13(2-3).
- Mitchell, Don and Nik Heynen (2009) 'The geography of survival and the right to the city: speculations on surveillance, legal innovation, and the criminalization of intervention', Urban Geography 30(6).
- Moseneke, [Justice D.] (2014) 'Judgment in the matter between South African Informal Traders Forum and others versus City of Johannesburg and others'. ZACC 8, Johannesburg: Constitutional Court.
- Nelson, Paul (2007) 'Human rights, the Millennium Development Goals, and the future of development cooperation', World Development 35(12).
- Nieftagodien, Noor and Sally Gaule (2012) Orlando West, Soweto: an illustrated history. Johannesburg: Wits University Press.
- O'Connell, Paul (2011) 'The death of socio-economic rights', Modern Law Review 74(4).
- Patel, Sheela, Carrie Baptist and Celine d'Cruz (2012) 'Knowledge is power – informal communities assert their right to the city through SDI and community-led enumerations', Environment and Urbanization 24(1).
- Pithouse, Richard (2008) 'A politics of the poor: shack dwellers' struggles in Durban', Journal of Asian and African Studies 43(1).
- (2013) 'The right to the city in South Africa', in Ilara Boniburini, Louisa Moretto, Judith Le Maire and Harry Smith (eds) The City as a Common Good: urban planning and the right to the city. Brussels: Cahiers d'Architecture.
- Purcell, Mark (2002) 'Excavating Lefebvre: the right to the city and urban politics of the inhabitant', GeoJournal 58.
- Rolnik, Raquel and Renato Cymbalista (2003) 'Self-managed housing construction: the experience of São Paulo', in Philip Harrison, Marie Huchzermeyer and Mzwanele Mayekiso (eds) Confronting Fragmentation: housing and urban - development in a democratising society*. Cape Town: University of Cape Town Press.

- SAFM (2013) Morning Live, interview with City of Johannesburg political representative on Operation 'Clean Sweep' and re-allocation of street traders. South African Broadcasting Corporation.
- Shields, Rob (1999) Lefebvre, Love and Struggle: spatial dialectics. London: Routledge.
- Shin, Hyun and Ernesto López-Morales (2011) 'Urban neoliberalism in the Antipodes? Towards a comparative case-study analysis on state, market agents, and property-led urban redevelopment in South Korea and Chile'. Unpublished paper, RC21 Conference, Amsterdam, July 7-9.
- Smith, Neil (2003) 'Foreword', in Henri Lefebvre The Urban Revolution. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- South Africa. Department of Human Settlements (2010) 'Working document on Dialogue 1: taking forward the Right to the City'. prepared for the World Urban Forum.
- Souza, Marcelo (2010) 'Which right to which city? In defense of political-strategic clarity', Interface: a journal for and about social movements 2(1).
- Souza, Marcelo (2003) 'Alternative urban planning and management in Brazil: instructive examples for other countries in the south?', in Philip Harrison, Marie Huchzermeyer and Mzwanele Mayekiso (eds) Confronting Fragmentation: housing and urban development in a democratising society. Cape Town: University of Cape Town Press.
- Stanek, Łukasz (2011) Henri Lefebvre on Space: architecture, urban research, and the production of Theory. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Todes, Alison (2009) 'Reframing urban planning: new agendas, shifting perspectives'. Inaugural Lecture, University of the Witwatersrand, School of Architecture and Planning, Johannesburg.
- Tolsi, Niren and Manqoba Nxumalo (2013) 'The scouring of Joburg's inner city', Mail and Guardian, October 25. <http://mg.co.za/article/2013-10-24-the-scouring-of-joburgs-inner-city/> (accessed October 25).
- Turner, John (1972) 'Housing as a verb', in J Turner and R Fichter (eds) Freedom to Build: dweller control of the housing process. New York: Macmillan.
- Turok, Ivan (2004) 'Cities, regions and competitiveness', Regional Studies 38(9).
- UN-Habitat (2010) 'Urban divide: unequal cities'. press release, Nairobi: UN-Habitat.
- Walsh, Shannon (2013) "'We won't move": the suburbs take back the center in urban Johannesburg', City: analysis of urban trends, culture, theory, policy, action 17(3).

World Bank (2013) South Africa Overview. Washington, DC: World Bank. <http://www.worldbank.org/en/country/southafrica/overview> (accessed 6 November).

Zikode, S'bu (2008) 'Sekwane! Sekwane! (Enough is enough!)', Journal of Asian and African Studies 43(1).

Zikode, S'bu (2011) 'Foreword', in Nigel Gibson Fanonian Practices in South Africa: from Steve Biko to Abahlali baseMjondolo. New York: Palgrave MacMillan; and Pietermaritzburg: University of KwaZulu-Natal Press.

Zikode, S'bu (2013) 'Despite the state's violence, our fight to escape the mud, shit and fire of South Africa's slums will continue', Guardian, November 12.